

Music fans the world over have been driven into a frenzy by an announcement from the Spice Girls. The announcement is... let me check my notes... oh. It's just a hashtag saying #Spiceworld25. Well, our codebreaking experts have conducted extensive research and determined that this likely alludes to the upcoming 25th anniversary of the critically-acclaimed film Spice World. The film, if you're able to remember all the way back to 1997, sees the gang return to the wasteland they thought they had managed to escape, needlessly battling the same enemies as last time and finishing up leaving feeling assured that they will probably fail to learn their lesson and repeat all their mistakes... whoops, I'm told this is actually the plot for The Lost World, the Jurassic Park sequel that came out the same year.

Still, not too far off. As with unruly scientists who refuse to learn not to mess around with dinosaur DNA no matter how many times it takes them to the brink of global disaster, people have once again started to meddle with '90s fashion. We refuse abjectly to learn the dangers of low-rise jeans, mullets, and—gulp—the dreaded jelly sandal. We were so preoccupied with the fact that we could die the tips of our hair blonde that we never stopped to ask whether we should.

Humanity has failed to learn its lesson again. All the omens are there, and it seems possible that the eponymous girls of spice will reunite once more to tour their dangers around the world and possibly even headline the Glastonbury festival in 2023. Or not... maybe it is just a tweet. Maybe Victoria Beckham will be too busy with her son Brooklyn's many careers that she will prevent a full reunion as she did on their last attempt. We can only hope.